

Excerpt from The Rock Tombs of El Amarna, Vol. 2: The Tombs of Panehesy and Meryra II As has been said in the former volume, the northern group of tombs at El Amarna lies on the N. E. Side of the desert plain (plate The hills here are cleft by a ravine which brings down the waters of the occasional torrential rains, formerly of enormously greater volume than now. The range at this point is not lofty, only reaching an elevation of about 280 feet above the level of the plain, and dipping somewhat on both Sides to the wady. It affords, as usual, a more or less abrupt face for the upper half of its height, and for the lower a steep footslope of looser rock (see photograph, Plate The rock-hewn tombs naturally lie at the meeting of the two, a little more than half-way up (approximately 150 feet for no. The limestone is Of bad quality, and contains enormous int-like boulders, which, freed from the rocks by denudation, cover the level heights above, like fallen fruit. It is in most places very subject to weathering, and many of the rock stelae have almost disappeared under this process. The stratification of the range has a dip approaching the vertical, and the weakness thus given to the surface of the tomb walls has caused much injury to the sculptures.
